Miracles. Often times used to describe an unexpected positive turn of events. Or perhaps, a reference of afterthought, following a life-altering experience. Moreover, a miracle can commonly refer to the physical representation or the Devine Reward, in the showing of complete trust and confidence in the absence of proof. We are all miracles to someone, for something, and from direct and personal experience. It is empowering to acknowledge the purpose for experiencing and understanding the miracle that we each are.

Mark Bigelow, also known as “Miracle Mark” is a walking miracle. In 2005, Mark had fallen victim to an unexpected brutal attack, where he was bludgeoned and beaten severely and left for dead. In what seemed to be a hopeless ordeal, doomed for fatality, Mark endured a series of 10 operations, which included complete facial reconstruction and was left in a vegetative state for 3 months, as friends and family of the successful owner of a local construction firm, awaited anxiously preparing for the possible, yet praying for what doctors described as the impossible.

Positive Turn of Events

After lying comatose for three and a half weeks, during a routine visit from his brother, Mark had awoken out of the coma and began to speak. The gracefully dubbed Medical Miracle had to begin a slow and painful journey to recovery. With the accident, Mark had developed mental injuries as well; with the mental capacity of an eight year old and a completely erased long-term memory, Mark had to rediscover how to mentally and physically function in life all over again.

After a period of a year and six months of recovery and exercising immeasurable patience, Mark was by complete medical astonishment, released to go home and resume life as it were, prior to that fateful night. Marks’ sense of normalcy was unaffected, because he had no recollection of his life or even his daughter Tori, which he relied on the memory of family and friends to illustrate his life journey for him. “Life is short; there is no warning for what may come.” Mark

With this maintained independence, Mark was able to once again, exercise his passion and go back to work.

Inspired to relocate to Georgia to reestablish his life and role as father to his daughter, Mark brought along with him his seasoned years of experience to embark on a new professional journey. Real Estate.
